Theory to explain low solubility of tris(hydroxymethyl)aminomethane in water. We derive the Gibbs-Thomson expression for the contact angle of a liquid droplet on an inclined substrate, based on the so-called geometrical model of wetting proposed by C. Dettre [M. P. Guggemos and C. Dettre, Macromolecules 1999, 32, 5661-5669]. The model treats the surface as a free energy minimum for which we calculate the surface tension. By equating the surface free energy to the volume free energy, we obtain an equation that relates the minimum surface energy to the derivative of the minimal surface with the droplet volume. The geometry of the substrate and the droplet are treated in the same way as liquid-liquid and liquid-solid interfaces, respectively, and we find that the contact angle increases monotonically with increasing droplet volume. This dependence is unexpected for tris(hydroxymethyl)aminomethane, a small molecule whose solubility in water is quite low. Such a dependence is reproduced in the developed model.
