Regression model for predicting risk of failure of cervical closing devices. The size, design, location, and extent of perforations in cervical os are a major factor for deciding the size of cervical closure devices. We present a regression model for predicting the risk of failure of cervical closure devices. We conducted a case-control study and collected data from 50 pregnant women at least 18 years of age with prolapse, with a crown rump length of 50-85 mm, and a cervical os diameter of 12-25 mm, at 20-40 weeks of gestation. The women were subdivided into three groups according to the size of cervical os and were matched for maternal age. The pregnant women were divided into two groups: one group with cervical closure devices that failed and one group that showed no complications. We investigated various cervical os parameters and determined which parameters were associated with the rate of the failure of the cervical closure devices. We established a regression model from this analysis, which enabled us to predict the rate of the
