Despite the relative importance of the noncognitive skills traditionally considered to be transferable, their relative integration with the cognitive dimensions of clinical competence is often not discussed. A review of the literature was conducted to assess the extent to which students are taught noncognitive skills and how the skills are integrated with the cognitive dimensions of competence. The course offered to health care professionals at a medical school was the focus of the review. Students in the course gained knowledge and skills necessary to perform clinical tasks and were assessed in a way that was consistent with the cognitive, affective, and behavioral dimensions of competence. The results demonstrated that students gained knowledge and skills necessary to meet the four cognitive dimensions of competence (diagnosis, clinical reasoning, counseling, and decision making) and effectively applied the skills to ensure that the four affective dimensions of competence were considered (caring, listening, and building relationships). Despite the focus of the course on cognitive skills, the data indicated that noncognitive skills were not formally taught to students. A systemic approach to the teaching of noncognitive skills was identified that was consistent with the assessment format used in the course to promote the integration of cognitive and noncognitive skills and the ability of the students to apply these skills to ensure that the four affective dimensions of competence were considered.

Agrony (ἄγρονη; feminine: Agronia) is a town and seat of Agrony Municipality in Georgia's eastern Imereti subdivision. As of 2009, the town has a population of 1,300.

Etymology The name is derived from Greek: ἄγρός agros “field” + νήματος neuma “water”. The name was first used by the Russians in the 19th century.
