Biochemical mechanisms of antiprotozoal activity of hypericin. Hypericin is one of the phototoxic phytochemicals isolated from Hypericum perforatum L., the St John's wort, with efficient photocytotoxic activity. In view of its use in the treatment of human disorders as well as the presence of this compound in certain plants, the mechanism of photocytotoxicity and antiprotozoal activity of hypericin is the subject of the present study. Hypericin was found to bind to the plasma membranes of Trypanosoma and Leishmania species. Hypericin-treated trypanosomes showed permeability changes of plasma membranes after illumination with visible light. Light-dependent hemolytic effects on erythrocytes are also attributed to hypericin and other hypericins. Hypericin targets organelles in trypanosomes and Leishmania amastigotes and disturbs their normal metabolism. Inhibition of nucleic acid synthesis and the inhibition of the release of certain lytic enzymes such as β -NADP(+)hydrolase and plasmatic membranes-related GSH S-transferase were observed. Hypericin seems to induce oxidative stress in the parasite. The possible involvement of reactive oxygen species generated from the photoactivated hypericin is analyzed. Enzymes derived from serine protease domains are used for a variety of industrial and research applications. One of the fundamental needs in the use of serine proteases is a high degree of purity. Purification of these enzymes has been a time consuming and laborious task because of their similar structures. A source of a series of enzymes with different structural features is needed to develop new methodologies in enzyme purification and substrate specificity studies. Two promising groups of serine protease are known to produce proteases with specific substrate binding sites. One group consists of serine proteases, the Kunitz type, with 2 or 3 cystine-rich modules. The other group is of the so-called astacin type, which contains a zinc metalloprotease domain and a cysteine protease domain. This unit presents a combination of a general methodology for the production of the astacin type of serine protease and a method for its purification by incorporating the protease domains of the enzyme into one protein.
