Four editors who had worked in the Soho office since the paper was founded in 1851 — including the current managing editor, Philip B. Corbett — were let go on Thursday. The departures were a victory for the print union, which had been having trouble with management at The Times, and The New York Post, which has a stable of 22 journalists in its office, and for The Associated Press, which covers The New York Times’s newsroom with its own staff. The changes included reassignments and cuts in the number of assigned reporters and dispatches. The Times on Thursday said it was cutting a total of 100 employees, five of whom had been hired by the newspaper this year. The employees affected included 13 “reporters,” 18 “correspondents,” 12 “editors” and 8 “executives.” The newsroom staff has been shrinking for years, but it has also undergone a seismic shift in recent years as the paper has undergone a digital transformation. Many of the casualties were hired by Jill Abramson, the former executive editor, and Chris Bodeen, who was then the deputy managing editor, to carry out the redesign. The changes come at a time of unrelenting turmoil at The Times. This week, the newspaper’s top two executives, Jill Abramson and Bill Keller, resigned in a dispute with Rupert Murdoch, the owner and chairman of the News Corporation, which owns The Times. The staff exodus began on Thursday, when the New York office received a memo from Steve Eyer, a managing editor in the newsroom, advising reporters of a cut in the number of reporters covering the paper. The memo said that “out of concern for accuracy and public trust, The Times is shifting some of its reporters to lighter assignments” and that the paper d0c515b9f4
