I've let the person I'm contacting know that I am testing out Skype for web, using skypeforweb.com, an addon for Skype. I see them, they see me. They can talk. I tried to put my normal profile user account's information in and it did not work, it was telling me that I was logging in as someone else. Also, it was saying that my name was wrong, though it is correct. It was saying that my email address was wrong. Skypeforweb.com can't pull my contact list to use in it, so Skype for web tried to pull my contact list for avasalala. It worked! Q: C# why my string parameter passed to function can be null? If I have some code like this: `private void foo(string name, byte[] b) { ... } ... foo("my string name", b);` ... the b parameter can be null but only if I set it from the C# code; if I pass it from the JAVA code the value of b is always set to a reference. Question is why? Why can I pass null, and what does it actually means? A: It is because of the way the method signature is defined in the .NET Framework: By default, a method's parameter is considered to be a ref or out parameter. That is, the default action of a calling method is to update the parameter value with the value that is returned by the method call. In other words, if you write `int Method(out string s) { s = "hello"; return s.Length; }` then the caller will be forced to either write `string s = null; Method(out s);` or `string s = "hello"; Method(out s);` `string t = s;` If you want to prevent the default action, you have to specify "ref" or "refout" between the parameter name and its type. That is, if you write `int Method(ref string s) { s = "hello"; return s.Length; }` then the caller will be forced to write `string s; Method(ref s);` or `string s = "hello"; Method(ref s);` `string t = s;` and if you write `int Method(out string s) { s = "hello"; return s.Length; }` b7e8fdf5c8
