In Python it is possible to pass default arguments, for example, to a function. From what I understand, this is achieved by using None as the default value: def frobnicate(a, b = None): print(a, b) But I'm wondering, is it possible to achieve the same effect through default arguments? And if so, how? It seems like you can only pass default arguments after the function body (ie: you can't modify arguments passed in after declaring the function). A: Python functions already know how to deal with default arguments; just pass them in before the list of positional arguments: def frobnicate(a, b = None, c = None): print(a, b, c) frobnicate(3, 4, "hello")
