Satellite DNA (SS DNA) is a repetitive DNA sequence and contributes to genome size by both regulating and mobilizing genes, as well as by being a source of repetitive DNA sequences. We analysed the SS DNA in the marbled eel, Anguilla marmorata, and found them to be comprised of highly repetitive centromeric SS DNA and a non-centromeric type of SS DNA. The centromeric SS DNA consisted of two types of repeat sequences: (1) direct repeat sequences that ranged from 62 to 366 bp and were of the same length in terms of base composition, and (2) inverted repeat sequences that ranged from 366 to 1836 bp in length and harboured a direct repeat sequence. These repeat sequences were composed of 71.5 to 89.7% G/C bases. The base composition of the remainder of the SS DNA was C/A (G/A). In contrast, in the non-centromeric SS DNA, the direct repeat sequences were longer in length and the proportion of G/C bases was higher. These results suggest that the centromeric SS DNA is predominantly comprised of tandem repeat sequences of a particular length and has a high G/C base composition. G/C base overrepresentation is consistent with the high frequencies of intragenic recombination occurring within codon-rich genes and the generation of codons rich in G and C bases. This may be important in the possible evolutionary mechanism of divergence and local adaptation by salt tolerance in A. marmorata.

Q: Plastic scalping for modelling? I recently purchased a set of old log runs and a set of planks on ebay (as pictured below). I bought them intending to build a simple harbour feature from the planks, which is going to be something to add to an
