Thyrotropin-releasing hormone (TRH) was firstly discovered in the hypothalamus, but it is also present in the pituitary, ovary, placenta, and testis. TRH was originally believed to be involved in thyrotropin release from the pituitary gland. We have reported that TRH is mainly localized in the anterior lobe of the pituitary gland and that TRH levels were lower in the infundibular region than in the stalk in thyrotoxic patients. We have also shown that TRH levels decrease with the dose and duration of antithyroid drug treatment. The relationship between TRH and thyroid hormone levels was studied in detail. A positive correlation was observed between the serum levels of TRH and free thyroxin (FT4). The TRH response, elicited by TRH in thyrotoxic patients, was also significantly higher than that in euthyroid or hypothyroid patients. Interestingly, the serum TRH response, elicited by TRH, was also positively correlated with FT4 and negatively correlated with thyroid-stimulating hormone (TSH) levels. These results indicate that TRH is involved in the regulation of thyroid function, and it might be a new etiological factor in thyroid disorders. In addition, we found that TRH-like substances were present in the thyroid. They were eluted in the same area as TRH on gel chromatography
