another recent addition to the athena range is the revit object library. the purpose of this is to make it possible to load the objects from the revit library into athena, so that the external geometry of the objects is taken into account. this is important in the case of faade elements, for example, when the geometry is not valid in the revit library but is valid in athena. the external geometry is then measured and transferred to athena. another new addition to athena is the new sat export function for the bim elements. in the case of faade elements, this is particularly advantageous, as here the sat is not provided in revit and can therefore not be imported, but can be exported from athena. the faade elements are then transformed into sat format and saved as an archicad file. the mep-software-xml (mepx) is a digital representation of mep services in an open and transparent manner. it is used in the planning process as a reference model. this is why the mep-software-xml is the standard export format in athena. mepx files can be imported into athena from the revit library with the assistance of the mep-software-xml exporter importer. in order to simplify the licensing of athena, we have now created the new license key, the so-called athena-ia64-key, which allows a single license to be shared. with this, the costs of the athena license are considerably reduced. the new license key, the athena-ia64-key, allows a single license to be shared. this means that it is now possible to have multiple athena licenses on a single revit server license. this makes it possible to license different athena versions on one computer without having to buy separate licenses. the license for the athena is deactivated after a certain amount of time and only activated if the revit server is started. this saves costs on a revit server license. 5ec8ef588b
