The problem with using VFX for transitions from any external editor or After Effects in particular is the "stickiness" of the objects in After Effects. For example, if you add a script to drag and drop an object or text, it will be stuck in the position you dragged it to unless you use the "Rotate Along Path" property in the effects menu, set it to "on", and then remove your script. Sometimes the script that gets created isn't what you want. If you use the Rotate Along Path property and have the object you drag with the script in After Effects, it will start rotating along the path and you will not have to deal with the sticky script issue. There are other times it's easier to remove the script from the object and create another one as needed (or even use the "Link" property to do the same). There is no free way to have access to the scripting of a free plugin. However, you do have access to the code, so you can look at it and tweak it for your own needs. If you need to buy a plugin and need to learn the scripting, the cost of purchasing the plugin could be more than what it would have cost to buy the code and tweak it yourself. For example, the price
