Java Swing setBounds() and resize() I'm working on a java swing program and I'm having problems with resizing components when using the setBounds() method. Currently, I'm using setBounds() to resize my Frame. The content pane of the frame is a JPanel that contains buttons and a label. I use setBounds() to move and resize the content pane. For example, if I move the frame, the labels moves, but the content pane is the size of the frame minus the width of the frame, the width of the frame. I'm trying to use the resize() method to resize the content pane. Thanks A: No, it's not the same. It doesn't move the component to the size you tell, but "repaints" it to that size. For the panel it shows what was last drawn, for the component it shows what it was last rendered to the component. If you want to resize it, just set the preferred size of the component and it will be resized (unless you also set the size of the frame, in which case it will also be set to that size). You should also note that if you resized components (maybe even though you didn't call setSize()) on the frame, you would need to call revalidate() and repaint() to make the changes take effect. A: Figured it out, using frame.setBounds(0,0, 100, 100). For some reason setting the width and height of the frame changes its size by the width of the frame minus the original frame size. However, setting the width and height of the component using setBounds works.
