Release notes1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a technology for preventing the load of a communication system. 2. Related Art In communication systems that communicate with each other by exchange of messages, it is known that, even when the communication paths are not equipped, an unnecessary load is caused due to the processing of messages and the transfer of large volumes of messages, which are sent and received without the path being equipped. In communication systems, when this unnecessary load is great, the processing capacity of the system declines, which may prevent the effective use of the system. There are known a variety of methods for suppressing such unnecessary load. For example, it is possible to establish a system that, when the number of messages of one sender (sending node) continues to increase without decrease in the number of messages of at least one receiver (receiving node) at that particular moment, an alarm is sent from the sending node, and a path is established between the nodes. However, in these methods, the path is established between the sending and receiving nodes by means of the transfer of messages and the processing of messages. Therefore, these methods have a problem in that costs for equipment, etc., required for the establishment of the path are incurred. As another example, regarding the transfer of messages, a link may be equipped that is used in only one direction at a time, and messages with different sender addresses are transferred separately. However, it is desirable for highly reliable communication paths to be established even between mutually distant nodes, and path setting with this method is not desirable for practical use. When the load of the system is to be increased in this manner, the system cannot maintain a sufficient number of paths. As a result, there is the problem that the time during which the system can conduct communication is shortened. When there are a large number of users in a particular area, the locations of the users are connected by an RF (Radio Frequency) antenna, for example. In such a case, when the load of the RF (Radio Frequency) antenna is large, there is a problem in that the path setting for the users of this area takes a time long enough to hinder effective use of the RF antenna.
